

A close-up photograph of several green bamboo stalks with their characteristic nodes and sheaths. The stalks are vertical and slightly curved, with some leaves visible at the top.

During pre-Spanish times the port of Pandan was an important trading post for Chinese and interisland vessels, and one of the commodities once traded there was bamboo. With the arrival of the Spaniards came the project to identify the names of places in the Philippines. Spaniards, busy patrolling the area for pirates known as tiron, came to a place near the island called Puro, and asked the name of the place.

Thinking that the Spaniards wanted to know the name of the bamboo floating in rafts on the Baggoc River waiting to be traded, they answered "kawayan." The Spaniard then listed the place's name as Caoayan. From that on the place was called CAYAN and became a municipality on 1825.
